The Codex Gigas, also known as the Devil's Bible, is a famous medieval manuscript from Bohemia that stands out for its size and striking illustrations. This 13th-century book contains the Old and New Testaments, historical texts, magic formulas, and other valuable materials. It was created in the 1200s and has an eventful history, having been owned by notable rulers such as Rudolph II of Habsburg and later taken as war booty during the Swedish siege of Prague. The World Digital Library collection presents materials freely available for use and reuse, with researchers encouraged to review source information attached to each item. It's essential to approach these materials with respect for the cultures and sensibilities of the people documented here. The provided text includes works such as "Devil's Bible," a codex commissioned by King Matthias Corvinus in Italy, and other ancient manuscripts like "Psalms of David" and "Treatise of the World's Creation." These materials are part of the Library of Congress collection, accessible through . The "Of Jewish Antiquities" codex was created by Fouquet for Jacques d'Armagnac, the Duke of Nemours. This manuscript contains four philosophical treatises written by John Wycliffe, a 14th-century English theologian and reformer. The works include "On Time", "On Divine Ideas", "On Matter and Form", and a reply on universals, which were likely composed by Wycliffe in collaboration with Jan Hus.
